Imp (imp), v. Forms: see the sb. [OE. impian (rare) = OHG. impfôn (rare), MHG. and Ger. impfen, beside which OHG. had (more commonly) impitôn, MHG. imp(e)ten. Da. ympe, Sw. ympa are from a LG. impen*; Welsh impio is from Eng. F. enter (whence MDu. enten, inten, Du. enten, MLG. enten) is supposed to be ultimately from the same source.

The history of this vb. and the prec. sb. is in some points obscure, from want of evidence. The corresponding F. enter to graft, ente (for empte*) graft, are referred by Darmesteter, etc., to late L. emputāre*, emputa*, the latter neuter pl. of Gr. ἔμφυτος, -ον implanted, engrafted: cf. ἐμφύειν to implant, ἐμφυτεύειν to implant, engraft, ἐμφυτεία implanting, engrafting. (There is evidence in the Salic Law for a med. L. impōtus, impotus, scion, graft.) This was presumably the source also of OHG. impitōn, not impfitōn), MHG. impfeten though some would refer it to L. putāre to prune. OE. impian, OHG. impfon, was evidently, from the OHG. lautverschiebung, a word of earlier adoption, but was prob. derived in some way from the same Gr. source (? from ἐμφυ-τεύ-ειν); of this the OE. sb. impa (hardly impe) must then have been a derivative, on the analogy of agent-nouns in -a; so mod. Ger. impf from impfen.]

‖ Imperator (impére·tŏi). Also 6 omp-. [L., agent-n. from imperā-re to command.]

a. In Roman History, a word originally meaning 'commander', under the Republic, conferred by salutation of the soldiers on a victorious general; afterwards, under the Empire, confined to the head of the state, in whose name all victories were won, and thus the equivalent of its English representative, EMPEROR, q.v.

From the ancient Roman Emperors, it was continued as the Latin title of the Emperors of the East and West, and so of all monarchs who claimed 'imperial' rank or position. In this sense it was commonly assumed in Latin documents) by the Old English kings from Æthelstan onward (see Freeman Norm. Conq. I. iii, and App. C); the OE equivalent was cāsere (cf. CÆSAR, KAISER, KAISER), the OE. repr. was empereor, whence EMPEROR.

1579–80 NORTH Plutarch (1595) 679 Pompeyes souldiers saluted him by the name of Imperator. 1646 SIR T. BROWNE Pseud. Ep. VII. xvi. 374 Julius Augustus and Tiberius with great humility or popularity refused the name of Imperator. 1853 W. Smith's Smaller Dict. Gr. & Rom. Antiq. (1868) 211/1 After a victory it was usual for the soldiers to salute their commander as imperator, but this salutation neither gave nor confirmed the title, since the title as a matter of course was given with the imperium. 1867 FREEMAN Norm. Conq. I. iii. 145 From the days of Æthelstan onwards, our kings..appear in their public acts as Basileus, Cæsar, Imperator, Imperator Augustus.

In (in), prep. Forms: a. 1- in; also 3 Orm. inn, 5 yn(e, ynne. β. 2-6 i, i-, 3-4 y, y-, 6- ī. [Common Teut. = OFris., OS., OHG., Goth. in, ON. í (Sw., Da. i), cognate with L. in, Gr. ἐν.

In OE., in all those texts in which the word occurs, the full form in is used, but in early ME. the apocopated i became common in certain dialects.

In the Ormulum, inn (=in) is employed before vowels and h, and i before all consonants except h. Early southern texts, such as the Lamb. and Cott. Homilies, Juliana, St. Kath., St. Marher., Ancr. R., etc., show a similar tendency, but with more or less irregularity, the MSS. often differing in this respect; on the whole, i is preferred when the prep. precedes the definite article or the demonstrative pronouns, as i þe, i þis, i þat. In some of these texts (Ancr. R., Lamb. Hom.) the relations of the two forms are further complicated by the use of Ing, which also appears (e. g. in Ayenb., Owl & Night., Shoreham) where i is rare or altogether wanting. The prevalence of i in these southern texts suggests that Ormin's use of this form was not due to Scandinavian influence, especially as northern writers (including Scottish down to 1600) always employed in, though i is common in the modern dialects. In standard English from the time of Chaucer in has been the normal form; but former colloquial usage is sometimes retained in verse in the combination i' th', or as an archaism in i' faith.

General Sense:—The preposition expressing the relation of inclusion, situation, position, existence, or action, within limits of space, time, condition, circumstances, etc. In ancient times, expressing also (like L. in) motion or direction from a point outside to one within limits; the two senses being determined by the case of the word expressing the limits, the former taking the dative (originally locative), the latter the accusative or case of direction. These cases being subsequently levelled, this distinction ceased to be practicable, and the latter relation is now ordinarily expressed by the compound in-to, Into; but there are various locutions in which (either because the accompanying verb conveys the sense of motion, or through the preservation of an ancient phrase without analysis) in still expresses motion from without to within.

In OE. (as in OS. and to some extent in OFris.) the prep. in was displaced by the prep. on (WGer. an, Goth. ana), so that in classical and late WSaxon, and to some extent in other OE. dialects, on was used for both on and in, an emphatic or distinctive sense of 'in' being however expressed by innan. (See full details in Dr. T. Miller, OE. Version of Bede, Introd. xxxiii xliv. In Anglian, esp. in the north and west, in remained (though, under WSax. influence, often displaced by on in documents); and in ME. the distinction of in and on was gradually restored, though many traces of their former blending still remain. (See sense 2.)

The formal coincidence of in with the L. prep. in (with which it is originally cognate) led to its being employed, in translating from L., in senses or uses which were idiomatic in L., but not originally English. These also have affected the current contextual use of the preposition.

I. Of position or location.

Primarily in (of position) is opposed to out of: anything which is in a given space is not out of it, and vice versa. The compound with-in, is mainly an equivalent of in emphasizing the relation to limits. The simple relation-words nearest in sense to in are at and on, with which in sometimes has common ground, e. g. 'in or at Oxford', 'in or on a street', 'in or on behalf of a man'. In may also have common ground with with, as 'to travel in or with a caravan, a railway train, etc.'.

1. Of place or position in space or anything having material extension: Within the limits or bounds of, within (any place or thing).

May relate to a space of any size, however large or small: e. g. in the universe, in the world, in heaven, in hell, in the earth, in the sea (otherwise on the earth, on the sea, at sea), in a field, wood, forest, desert, wilderness (but on a heath, moor, or common), in (U.S. on) a street, in a house, carriage, box, drawer, nut-shell, drop of water, etc.

V. Of motion or direction. See also 16.

30. Expressing motion or direction from without to a point within, or transition from one thing to another: = Into.

In OE. this was the proper sense of in with the accusative: see above. The sense of 'into' is still retained after some verbs, as put, cast, split, part, where the sense implies motion, and in some idiomatic phrases which are no longer analysed.

II. The Italian prep. = Latin in, as in the phrases in fresco, in petto, for which see the sbs.

In, obs. f. INN; var. HIN pron. Obs., him.

In-, pref.[1], the prep. and adv. IN, in combination with verbs, verbal derivatives, and other words. In original compound verbs, unaccented in- passed in WS. into on- (cf. IN prep., General Sense): e.g. Goth. inliuhtjan, OHG. inliuhten, OE. onlíehtan to enlighten, illuminate; Goth. intandjan, OE. ontendan to set on fire, Goth. inwandjan, OE. onwendan to turn, change. In such of these verbs as survived in ME., on- was normally reduced to a-. But, in late OE., numerous new verbs in in- appeared as glosses or literal renderings of Latin verbs in in-, e.g. inbláwan = L. inflāre, inspīrāre to blow in, inbringan = L. inferre to bring in, inlédan = L. introducĕre to lead in. The formation of these in similar circumstances continued in ME. to the close of the 14th c., when numerous examples occur in Wyclif. Among the ME. examples are inclepe, L. invocāre to call in, indelve, L. infodĕre to dig in, injette, L. infundĕre to pour in, inloje, L. inflammāre to inflame, inwlappen, L. involvĕre to enwrap, inwrite, L. inscribĕre to inscribe. Few or none of these verbs have survived into mod. English. In OE. the adv. inn, in, was also freely used in collocation with verbs of motion or change of state. The position of the adv. was with the finite tenses, variable; in the infinitive it generally stood before the vb., and in derived verbal sbs. and adjs. always so. In this position the adv. came at length to be written in combination with the vb., e.g. income-n, incoming, income sb., indwelle-n, indwelling, indweller, etc. In the infinitive and other verbal forms in- remained movable, and is now regularly placed after the verb, as in come in, go in, call in, lead in, etc.; but the derived sbs. and adjs. in which the position of in- was invariable, have become regular compounds with stress on in-, thus incoming, income, incomer (beside come in), indwelling, indweller (beside dwell in), inlet, insight, intake, etc. See IN adv. 11. (Cf. the parallel case of German verbs with movable prefixes, as eingehen, einzugehen, eingegangen, gehe ein, er geht ein, wenn er eingeht, eingang, eingehend; eingeben, eingeber; etc.) There are also various other formations, OE., ME., or modern, in which this prefix occurs, usually with the sense 'in, within, internal', e.g. OE. ingehygd, ingepanc internal thought, intent, inland demesne land, ME. inwit conscience; mod. inborn, inside, inward, etc. In a few instances prepositional phrases with in- have given rise to attributive combinations, as in-college residents, in-door occupations.

As to the blending of this prefix and In- pref.[2] in later use, see at the end of the latter.

In-, pref.[2], repr. L. in- adv. and prep., used in combination with verbs or their derivatives, less commonly with other parts of speech, with the senses 'into, in, within; on, upon; towards, against', sometimes expressing onward motion or continuance, sometimes intensive, sometimes transitive, and in other cases with little appreciable force.

Form-history. In earlier L., in- was generally retained unchanged before all consonants; but in later times it was assimilated to the following consonant, becoming il- before l, im- before a labial, ir- before r. These changes are retained in Eng.: e.g. il-late, im-bue, im-mit, im-pel, ir-radiate: see IL-[1], IM-[1], IR-[1]. In OF., in inherited words, in-, im-, became en-, em-; but learned words derived or formed from L., esp. in later times, regularly retained in-, im-. The French words were adopted in Eng. in their current form; but from the 14th c.

onward, there was a growing tendency in words in which the L. derivation was evident, to change en-, em- back to L. in-, im-, as in the words of learned origin. This was even extended to some words which were not obviously, or not at all of L. origin, including some of those in which en-, em- was, as a living formative, prefixed to radicals of OE. or other origin. (See EN-.) Conversely, some words directly from L. were formed with the French en-, em-. Hence, a large number of words occur in the 15th and 16th c. with both forms of the prefix, and some have retained both forms to the present day, either with no distinction of sense, as in enclose, inclose, enquire, inquire, or with differentiation of use, as ensure, insure. The general tendency (though with numerous exceptions) has been to establish in-, im-, in words evidently derived from L., reserving en-, em-, for words formed in French and not having a L. type, or in which the L. type is disguised by phonetic change, and for words formed in Eng. on the analogy of these. In this Dictionary, current words are placed under their usual form, whether in- (im-) or en- (em-), or, in unsettled cases, in that which, on grounds of etymology or analogy, appears to be the preferable form; obsolete words have been dealt with on the same principles, and cross-references have been given to the form under which each word is treated.

Since IN-[1] and IN-[2] are identical in form, and to a great extent in sense, they come in later use to be felt as one and the same prefix; and it is this resulting prefix which appears in many words of later formation, formed upon native substantives or adjectives, in which in-, im-, has affinities at once with the prefix en-, em-, from French, and with OE. in-.

In-, pref.[3], the Lat. in-, cognate with Gr. α-, ἀν-, Com. Teut. un-, prefixed to adjs. and their derivatives, rarely to other words, to express negation or privation; as félix happy, infélix unhappy, utilis useful, inutilis useless, nocēns hurtful, innocēns unhurtful, innocent, doctus learned, indoctus unlearned. In earlier Latin, in- was used before all consonants, but in later times was subjected to the same assimilations as IN-[2], as in il-litterātus illiterate, im-mensus unmeasured, immense, ir-regulāris without rule, irregular, and was besides reduced to i- before gn, as in i-gnārus ignorant; i-gnōscĕre not to take cognizance of, to overlook, forgive. In a few OF. words, L. in- became en- as in IN-[2], e.g. inimīcus, OF. enemi enemy, L. invidia, OF. envie envy; but most French words containing this prefix are of learned formation, and retain L. in- (il-, im-, ir-); as is the case also in Eng. with words derived either through French, or from L. direct. In Eng. in- (il-, im-, ir-) is a living negative suffix for words of Latin or Romanic origin, freely used, even when no corresponding formation appears in Latin; in this use it interchanges to some extent with the OE. negative un-, which is used in native or thoroughly naturalized words, e.g. incautious, uncautious, in-, un-ceremonious, in-, un-certain, in-, un-communicative, in-, un-devout, in-, un-distinguishable. In such cases the practice in the 16th and 17th c. was to prefer the form with in-, e.g. inaidable, inarguable, inavailable, but the modern tendency is to restrict in- to words obviously answering to Latin types, and to prefer un- in other cases, as in unavailing, uncertain, undevout.

In-, pref.[4], of Teut. origin, prefixed to OE. and ME. adjs., with intensive force. In origin akin to IN- pref.[1], with the sense 'inly', 'intimately', 'thoroughly', and hence 'exceedingly', 'very'. Examples: OE. indryhten most noble, infrōd very wise, inhold thoroughly loyal; ME. inred deep red. (On this prefix in the cognate langs., see Hœfer 'Das intensive IN ', in Germania, new ser. III. 61.)

-in, suffix[1]. Chem. A modification of the chemical suffix -INE[5], introduced into systematic nomenclature by Hofmann a 1860, used systematically in Watts' Dict. Chem. in 1866, and subsequently adopted by the Chemical Society, for the names of neutral substances, such as glycerides, glucosides, bitter principles, colouring matters, and proteids, which are thus distinguished from names of alkaloids and basic substances in -INE. Examples, albumin, casein, fibrin, globulin, mucin, myosin, pepsin; cerebrin, chitin, chondrin, gelatin, lecithin; acetin, alizarin, aloïn, arbutin, cerotin, curcumin, dextrin, hæmatin, indigotin, inulin, isatin, palmitin, purpurin, salicin, ulmin, vanillin. Some of these were formerly spelt with -ine, and in that spelling had passed into popular use before the rectification of the nomenclature, esp. dextrine, gelatine, margarine, which are still commonly so spelt in non-scientific use.

1881 Chemical Society, Instructions to Abstractors p 16 Basic substances should invariably be indicated by names ending in -ine, as anitine, instead of anilin, the termination -in being restricted to certain neutral compounds, viz. glycerides, glucosides, bitter principles, and proteids, such as palmitin, amygdalin, albumin.

-in, suffix[2], an obs. variant of -INE[1] in adjs., as feminin, genuin, etc.; also an occasional variant of -INE[4]:—L. -ina, as in ruin.

-ina, suffix[1], a Latin feminine suffix found in reg-īna queen, extended in It. or Sp., and thence in Eng. use, to form feminine titles, as czar-ina (for Russ. tsaritsa), and female Christian names, as Alexandr-ina, Angel-ina, Christ-ina, Clement-ina, Georg-ina, Thomas-ina, Wilhelm-ina, etc. (Cf. -INE[4].) It occurs also as a formative of some other words, as in concertina, seraphina, etc., names of musical instruments.

-ina, suffix[2], in words which are the neuter pl. of L. adjs. in -īnus, and in mod.L. words formed after them, used (in agreement with animālia animals, understood) to form names of groups of animals related to some typical genus, as Bombycina (genus Bombyx), etc.

†Inco·rding, vbl. sb. Obs. [f. Incord v. + -ing 1 (cf. quot. 1607).] Rupture or hernia in a horse.

1598 Florio, Incordatura, ..the incording or bursting of a horse. 1607 Topsell Four-f. Beasts (1658) 307 This term, Incording, is borrowed of the Italian word Incordato, which in plain English is as much to say as Bursten. . The Italians, as I take it, did call it Incordato, because the gut follows the string of the stone, called of them Il cordone, or La corda, whereof Incordato seems to be derived with some reason. According to which reason we should call it rather Instringed, then Incorded; for Corda doth signifie a string or cord. Notwithstanding, sith that Incording is already received in the stable, I for my part am very well content therewith, minding not to contend against it. 1610 Markham Masterp. II. xlix. 292 This incording or burstinesse in horses, is when the rim or thinne filme which holdeth the guts vp in a horses body is broken, so that the guts falleth downe either into the cods of the horse, or into the horses flancke. 1725 Bradley Fam. Dict. s.v. Rupture, Rupture otherwise called Incording or Burstness, a distemper in a horse.
